6. New contributions of the thesis:

First: The thesis has systematized general theoretical issues, including: related concepts and theories, the historical context, the development process of Vietnamese journalism in the early 20th century, as well as the life and journalistic career of Pham Quynh. The research points out that his ideology was a consistent whole regarding the role of journalism in social modernization and cultural preservation. Pham Quynh is identified as one of the historical catalysts in the modernization process of Vietnamese journalism in the early 20th century.

Second: The thesis has surveyed, systematized, and analyzed Pham Quynh's contributions across two distinct roles: author (focusing on the content and form of his works) and editor-in-chief (focusing on the organizational and management models of the newsroom) toward the development of early 20th-century Vietnamese journalism. The study initially conceptualizes and defines the core characteristics of the academic journalism movement of the early 20th century through the case study of Nam Phong Magazine, thereby establishing a theoretical framework for future research on academic journal models.

Third: The thesis has provided a comprehensive evaluation of Pham Quynh's position, role, and certain historical limitations within the development process of Vietnamese journalism in the early 20th century. From this analysis, it draws meaningful implications and lessons applicable to contemporary journalism.
