7. New conclusions of the dissertation:

First, the study clarifies the theoretical basis for the role of the State in implementing social security policies from the perspective of Marxist-Leninist philosophy, in relation to the social functions of the State, the assurance of social security rights, and the advancement of social progress and equity.

Second, the study systematizes four fundamental dimensions of the role of the State: policy institutionalization; organization and coordination of implementation; mobilization and allocation of resources; and inspection, supervision, evaluation, and policy adjustment.

Third, the study clarifies the transformation in the way the State exercises its role, from direct management and intervention toward providing direction, institutional development, coordination, rights assurance, and promoting the participation of social actors.

Fourth, the study identifies the need to strengthen the State's adaptive capacity in response to emerging social changes and risks; on that basis, it proposes orientations and solutions for developing a modern, inclusive, sustainable, and adaptive social security system in Vietnam.
